Upon the return of the jury at 1 o'clock, court was resumed and the verdict was read.

A large crowd gathered in the courtroom, and as the jury filed into the box there was a deathlike silence throughout the room. Mrs. Boyle sat at her counsel's table beside her brother. The two were extremely nervous, and when the foreman of the grand jury in response to the question of the court, announced that they had found the deendant guilty of abetting and aiding kidnaping of Willie Whitia, the confendant guilty of abetting and aiding until the blood started. William F. McDermott, the Chicago broker's clerk, said to be the brother of Mrs. James Boyle, today made an apparent acknowledgment of the relationship. He appeared for the first time in court, and took a seat beside her.

Mrs. Collins remembers that a bottle of laudanum had been kept in the house, and a search revealed the fact that some one had removed it. The authorities are working on the idea that the presence of the laudanum in the house must have been known for some time to the person who administered it to the child.

THE DRAMATIC STORY OF MRS. BOYLE

The Woman in the Whitla Kidnaping Case Told by ALLEN D. ALBERT, Jr.

In Tomorrow's Sunday Evening Edition of The Times

Mr. Albert has spent the past week in the court room at Mercer, in the Whitla home, and in other places connected with this most celebrated kidnaping case of recent years. He found the mystery of the case and its drama to center around the extraordinary, the facinating personality of Mrs. Boyle. He learned her life story in all its variety-her remarkable education and her natural refinement and her habits of mean thievery and common associations. He unearthed the motive which was behind her connection with the kidnaping. He talked with her and with Boyle, her reputed husband. From Mr. and Mrs. Whitla he heard the story of the agonizing days that followed the stealing of little Billy and of the supreme joy that came with his return.

Mr. Albert tells you about it all in tomorrow's Sunday Evening Edition of The Times.
